Asperger's Syndrome is a neurodevelopmental disorder that is characterized by difficulties with social interaction, communication, and repetitive patterns of behavior. People with Asperger's may also have sensory sensitivities and motor coordination difficulties.

Asperger's is often considered to be a mild form of autism, but it is important to note that every person with Asperger's is different. Some people with Asperger's may have significant challenges in social situations, while others may be able to function well in social settings.
