The Luddites were a group of English textile workers who destroyed machinery in protest of the Industrial Revolution. They were the first organized labor movement in history and their actions had a profound impact on the development of the labor movement and the course of the Industrial Revolution.

The Luddites were active in the early 19th century, during a time of great economic and social change. The Industrial Revolution was transforming the way that goods were produced, and this was leading to widespread job losses and poverty. The Luddites were particularly concerned about the of new machinery, which they believed was putting them out of work.

In response to these changes, the Luddites began to organize and attack factories and machinery. They would often use hammers and other tools to smash the machines, and they would sometimes set fire to factories. The Luddites were also known for sending threatening letters to factory owners, warning them to stop using machinery or face the consequences.

The Luddite movement was eventually suppressed by the government, but it had a lasting impact on the labor movement. The Luddites showed that workers could organize and fight for their rights, and they helped to lay the foundation for the modern labor movement.
